If you lived 150 years ago, there would have been very few story books and no pleasant libraries. Here is one book that was written then and is still here for you to read today. The person who wrote it knew how people feel and what most of us think about and how to say what we are all interested in. While his name was not on the title-page, we believe that Oliver Goldsmith wrote it. We think so because this story sounds like Oliver Goldsmith. We know a great deal about him and his way of writing. His own life had taught him the sorrows of poverty. His heart was kind and generous and he could make his readers see the amusing side of life. You will find in Goody Two Shoes these very qualities. When you read about his time, you will want to know what some things mean which children in England understood. A number of these are explained at the bottom of the pages on which they occur. Perhaps the difference which you will notice particularly concerns the school that Margery kept. There were no public schools at the time. Usually rich people employed teachers to live in their homes. Then they were sent to boarding schools and colleges. Poorer people generally had to be satisfied with what were called "dame schools." The children went to the teacher's house, as a rule, and did not get much beyond very easy reading. In some villages there were schoolhouses and the children studied under schoolmasters. In either case the parents had to pay for the teaching and the books, and children who did not learn well were severely punished. You see that when Goody Two Shoes began to teach the little children in her free, pleasant way, they had a much happier time than if they had gone to the usual school. No wonder they and their mothers liked her so much. It would be fun, indeed, to be helped through the lessons by all the intelligent pets that flocked around Margery. That was the kind of school that Goldsmith himself would have liked when he was a little boy.
